

Mondo appealed his conviction to federal courts and was told the U.S. Supreme Court would no longer hear Fourth Amendment claims on habeas corpus. The Court did not dispute the findings of the lower courts that he was being held in prison in violation of the Constitution. When he appealed his conviction according to the new rule, he was told he had missed the filing deadline.